CATHA ANN DOLAN .- This girl, who, it was foared, had b en spirited away from Castle Garden, soon after she, landed from the emigrant ship that brought her from Liverpool, has been found safe and well, at service In Flushing avenue, Brooklyn. Her sister, a very gen-teel, ibteligent Irish girl, called with Catharine to express their grateful feelings to THE TRIBUNE; for "sure "it was that that brought us together," after some twe months of deep anxiety; the one at the thought of being all thone in a world so vast that she was but a speck on the ocean; and the other tormented with the fear that her sister had fallen among the sharks. It seems that the story told the sister at Cartle Garden about Catharine being taken away by some man who protended to know her brother and sister, and promised to take her to them, was an error, or rather it applied to some other poor friendless immigrant—perhaps the same one who Mr. Fay wrote us was at the Emigrant Refuge Hospital, on Ward's Island, whose case so much resem bled the one described in the article headed, "A Crue Wrong." It appears that the brother and sister live in Bellville, New-Jersey, and had sent Catharine money to pay her passage, and that she left Liverpool with five dollars, which some of the bloodsuckers that swarm upon every emigrant ship managed to absorb during the passage, so that when she landed she was penniless, friendless, and only knew that her brother and sister lived in New-Jersey, and probably supposed that anybody she in-quired of could tell her how to find them, just as easy as a brother of John Smith could find that individual in New-York City. What could she do alone in such a city without money? She even did not know that her sister had got the letter announcing to her that she was crossing the ocean, and so she could not expect that she would fly to meet her as she did, and arrived at Castle Garden only five minutes after Catharine had left, where she heard the tale that made her sick at heart. But why did she leave, and where had she gone? Rather, why should she stay? She had nothng to stay for, and hunger and want would soon force her to go somewhere. She determined wisely to go at once. She remembered the name of an acquaintance who lived in Jersey City, whose address had been given her by another acquaintance just before she sailed. Thither she went, found the place readily, but could not find her own friends. She did not think to advertise she had not lived where everybody, rich and poor, takes a paper-where everybody that knows his own interest and how to promote it advertises— advertises everything and for everything. Her brother did advertise, but Catharine had not yet learned to look to het morning papers as the very place to find her lost sister. So she "stopped up in Jersey City two weeks," and then found a place to go to work in Brooklyn, waiting with hope and patience for "the luck" that would bring her and her sister together. "The luck" came through our columns, and judging from the appearance of the faces of two good girls, we have been the means of making two members of the great American family happy, and we are satisfied.

quence of the favorable harvest weather. Money was active, and Consols dull but strong, closing at 95c., an advance of | per cent. on the last steamer. The Bank of England had lost £48,649 from the specie reserve during the week. The imports of specie during the week had been £1,058,000, mostly from Australia, and the exports had been £900,000. No change had been made in the bank rate of interest. The demand for gold for the Continent, mainly for the purchase of silver, continued. The failure of the Royal British Bank had caused much excitement. Its losses were on loans to Mining Companies and to Mr. Oliver of Liverpool. It was thought the entire capital was sunk, and the stockholders would be called upon to pay up further under their individual liability. The Bank has been badly managed, and has been bankrupt for some time, although it went on making dividends. By this steamer we have received a very compre-hensive and elaborate circular from Mr. Satterthwaite of London, entirely devoted to the position and prospects of the Illinois Central Railroad. It was prepared from personal investigation by Mr. Clement Satterthwaite during his recent visit to this country, and conveys the fullest information upon the subject of that road which has ever been given to the stockholders. It would make about ten columns solid of THE TRIBUNE.

We have only room to-day to extract the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Satterthwaite of the future of this
